These Councils are quasi government agencies. They exist in both the Atlantic and Pacific. I don't know what WestPac thinks about the monuments but isn't it too late?

To whom it may concern:

On behalf of Kitty M. Simonds, Executive Director of the Western Pacific Regional Fishery Management Council, we wish to request a brief phone or in-person meeting with Secretary Ryan Zinke regarding the 740,313,169 acres of marine national monuments in the Pacific currently under review. This acreage constitutes more than half of the federal waters in the US Pacific Islands and 98 percent of area under monument review.

The Western Pacific Regional Fishery Management Council has authority over these fisheries under the Magnuson-Stevens Fisheries Conservation and Management Act. The US fisheries in this region produce 80 percent of the nation's fresh domestic bigeye tuna and 50 percent of its yellowfin tuna and swordfish. The fishing sector also accounts for 52 percent of the American Samoa gross domestic product.

Given the time-sensitive nature of the monument review, we look forward to timely response.

Thank you,

Sylvia Spalding for Kitty M. Simonds
